One of the tools I find essential for teaching is journaling. I recently wrote about how I journal for my own research, and I have incorporated the same practice in my teaching. When I teach introductory religious studies classes, for example, the course objective I focus most on is helping students learn how to read and interpret religious texts. In the end, whether the students retain what they've learned about—for example—early church heresies and the Christian understanding of the Trinity, the skill of being able to read a religious text and understand the author's ideas about God can be more broadly applicable. Journaling assignments are an effective way to get students to actively think about their reading and class content instead of just glossing over it as they prepare for class or trying to passively retain it. As I note in my assignment guidelines, journals are powerful tools of reflection, that is, "the process whereby we reconstruct and make meaning of our experience." [1] Journaling also helps students become better writers, both by providing the space to think through ideas informally and by helping build writing motivation and fluency.

I use journals in undergraduate and graduate classes, but in what follows I will provide practical guidelines based on how I've used journals in introductory courses. For more examples and ideas, I highly recommend the book Journal Keeping by Dannelle D. Stevens and Joanne E. Cooper that I quoted above.

In my introductory religious studies course, "The Christian Tradition," I have students write reading response journals using the journal feature on Blackboard, a practice I began during the pandemic. The accompanying image is a screenshot of the instructions for the journal that students see on Blackboard.

Instructions

After you finish reading the text theologically, you will write your reflection in the online journal. To begin, write the topic in the title section for the journal. The title can be the name of the text that you will write about and/or the theme that you will discuss. Then, set a timer for 10 minutes and free write your response to the reading. Again, the point of this assignment is for you to express your own thoughts about the reading assignments. You can write in any way that makes sense to you as long as your reflection is rooted in and connected to the text. I recommend making specific references to the text as that is a good way to keep your thinking rooted in the assigned readings. If you need some guidance for your entry, consider the following questions:

1. What is this text claiming, arguing, or implying about God?
2. What is this text claiming, arguing, or implying about the condition of human beings and how they relate to God and each other?
3. How does this text compare to your own beliefs and experiences?

Your journal post should give a substantive response to the reading in at least a paragraph (aim for at least ~250 words). This is meant to be a form of free writing, so the emphasis is primarily on the expression of your ideas in writing. Try not to just summarize the content of the writing but explore an idea or passage more deeply.

Rubric

0%		Journal entry missing for class or one that is so disorganized it does not sufficiently fulfill the requirements of the assignment.
75%	Unsatisfactory	Journal entry fulfills the requirements of the assignment, but it does not show an adequate level of reflection and insight and may seem hastily done. It may only provide a summary of the reading (or of our discussion of the text in class) without further analysis.
85%	Satisfactory	Journal entry fulfills the requirements of the assignment and shows a good level of reflection and insight but may rely too much on summary. Or the journal may meet the exceptional grading criteria but was submitted after the text was discussed in class.
100%	Exceptional	Journal entry fulfills the requirements of the assignment and shows an excellent level of reflection and insight.

For this, students free write their responses to the reading assignments before class. The class meets twice a week, but I only require the journal entry to be done once a week unless students are absent, in which case they must do their journal entry for the class they missed. I emphasize that I am not looking for students to be “right” or “wrong” about their interpretation, but to engage with and respond to what the text says from their perspective. I ask them to complete this before the class to prepare them for our discussion. One change I implemented this past semester was to delay this at-home journaling until the fourth week. Instead, we did journal entries in class after the discussion, and I provided written feedback to help the students learn this skill. After we did this in class, I could use the Blackboard rubric to give minimal feedback on their online journal entries. Because students in this class only write one entry a week, I read and grade every single entry they complete.

In contrast, in an interdisciplinary general education course that I teach titled “Discovering the Self in the Universe,” I ask students to use a physical journal just for that class. They write responses to the reading assignments, but they also use the journal for in-class reflection. This class is writing intensive, so students do much more journaling than I require in “The Christian Tradition.” Because the students are writing more, I do not read every entry in this case. For grading, I collect the journals three times during the semester and check for completeness (50 percent of the grade), then read five entries which I grade for quality (50 percent of the grade), having provided them with a simple rubric at the beginning of the semester.

Students generally respond positively to the journal. In last semester's final course evaluations, in response to the question on what was most effective about the class, several students mentioned journaling. Students noted that this assignment "helped me examined [sic] the text more closely" and "really helped me express my opinion and also remember what we did in earlier sessions." I was teaching "Discovering the Self in the Universe" for the first time, and in that class one of my students, Sebastian Derflinger (name used with permission), chose to do his final presentation—about what was most beneficial for them in the course—on the practice of journaling. Derflinger is from Austria, so he noted that the ability to write freely in English without worrying about mistakes was a particular benefit for him. He also noted the importance of building the habit of journaling to improve how he expresses his thoughts, record important ideas, and go deeper into the course content. He said that journaling in my class led him to start a private journal about his goals, experiences, and thoughts. These are just a few examples of student responses, but they give a sense of the positive responses I receive about this. I am thus a huge proponent of journaling, both for myself and for my students.
