Fellowship Program for Early Career Workshop Participants

Description

The Wabash Center is committed to developing faculty members who are critically reflective about their teaching. Our Early Career Teaching and Learning workshops are designed to engage the participants in developing the craft of teaching, understanding one’s own teaching vocation, and analyzing how one’s institutional context shapes the work of the classroom.

The Workshop Fellowship Program extends this work by awarding a fellowship of $5,000 to workshop participants for a teaching project that takes place in the academic year following the workshop.

A good teaching project will address questions arising from the faculty member’s classroom experience and teaching. It might focus on learning more about the students being taught and the competencies they bring to the classroom; it might involve a specific course that did not go well the first time it was taught; it might seek to understand why a particular concept is challenging for students to learn; why a particular topic is encountering resistance; or it might involve deepening the faculty member’s understanding of how to facilitate difficult conversations in the classroom, such as those around racial privilege, gender and sexuality, or interfaith issues.

The Fellowship is to help the faculty member learn about teaching. Thus the workshop participant should structure the project with reference to a specific course or class, and have a good understanding of their students and institutional context. Some questions that might help clarify the teaching project are the following:

- Who are my students? How do they learn?
- What do I want them to learn? Why would they care? How does this subject matter touch their interests or passions?
- What are my departmental or institutional learning goals? How do my courses fit in with the courses that other faculty members are teaching in the school/department?
- What is my teaching style? How can I best influence the students? How do I know that they are learning what I want them to learn?

Applications

Apply online by August 15 of the second summer of the workshop.
1. Application Cover Sheet
2. Project Description
   - The question, dilemma, or issue that you want to address
   - The goals you have for your work and what you will have to show that you met these goals
   - The particular class in which you will test your work
   - The preparatory work and activities this will involve
   - Which colleagues will be conversation partners for you in this project
   - Ongoing assessment strategies to help you understand what you are learning
3. Timeline of Project Activities (1 page, attached): Link the steps involved in your work to specific dates, including preparatory activities, dates of classroom exploration or work involved, and assessment processes.
4. A letter of support from a department chair, assistant, or director that addresses the following points:
   - The institution’s support for your teaching fellowship project, including the resources the institution will need to provide you during the work
   - The project’s contribution to institutional or departmental goals
   - How this work will be regarded in the institution’s advancement and review process

Final Report

A final (5-page) report on your work and activities is due by June 15 at the end of the project. The report should have these elements:

- Description of what you actually did during the project
- Critical reflection on your experience and what you learned. Revise your project description and goals. What did you learn about teaching? About your students and how they learn? About your institutional context and its effect on your classroom?
- Reflections: What do you find next and what will be helpful to you in developing this next phase?

Funding Process and Conditions

Once your project is submitted and approved, an agreement letter will be sent outlining the terms between you and the Wabash Center. A check for one-half of the amount ($2,500) will be sent as soon as the paperwork has been completed. The second half of the fellowship ($2,500) will be sent upon receipt of the Final Report. No taxes will withheld from the fellowship awards; the balance will be reflected on the 1099-P form sent to you by Wabash College at the end of the calendar year.

Any significant change in your project must be approved in advance by the Wabash Center. Send a letter or email to Gina Hulse (Grants Coordinator) that describes and justifies the changes so that we can determine whether the new plan fits within the intent of the approved fellowship. If the project no longer fits with the intent of the approved fellowship, you are required to inform the Wabash Center immediately.

The fellowship award is contingent upon full participation in all three sessions of the Early Career Workshop.
